Excerpt: . made apparent from the Roman legislation, and we shall meet with many other instances in that of more modern governments. One distinction is however very necessary to be made. Sometimes these revolutions arise from a defect, merely of a part, at others the whole is faulty. In the first case, the venerable fabric of antiquity may be preserved in full strength and beauty, with a few trifling alterations; in the second, an entire new structure must be raised from the ground. The former of these enterprises may not be a work of much difficulty, obstacles almost innumerable obstruct the latter. CHAP. VII. OF THE OBSTACLES IN A CHANGE OF THE LEGISLATION OF A PEOPLE, AND THE MEANS OF SURMOUNTING THEM. If the legislature persuade at the time it acts-- if the public inclination be attended to in the formation of laws--if their...
