Not illustrated. 1886 Excerpt: . . . in the quality of the product and the profits of the business, for no degree of ability- or foresight in the management can counteract the ravages of a wasteful cutter; and upon the faithfulness and skill of the laster depend the fit and set of the shoe, assuming, of course, that the work leading up to the laster has been faithfully done. Hence it is, that good lastcrs are always in demand, and their Union has maintained a more independent position than any other organization connected with the craft has been able to assume. Invention has now turned its attention to this department, and a young Lynn mechanic has produced a lasting machine which promises to be successful, though it has not yet come into general use. From the laster the shoe goes to the sole-layer, whom we number 23; next to the McKay stitcher, 24; and...
