L is a small incandescent lamp, which can be moved in the tube, cd an opal glass plate and mn an iris-diaphragm. Fig. 1. The illumination of the plate ab is altered by means of the iris-diaphragm until the brightness of ab appears to be equal to that of some portion of the sky. The brightness is measured by the diameter of the opening in the diaphragm. With this instrument some determinations have been made in our country and also in South-Africa at a greater altitude above the sea-level. The results were nearly equal to those obtained by other investigators. In South-Africa, however, the relative brightness of the Galaxy was found to be a little greater than in our country. On the whole the instrument did not answer the purpose. First the bounding line between the two comparison-fields could not be made sufficiently sharp and therefore it did not vanish at equal illumination. Secondly the comparisons were hindered by the slightest difference of colour between the illuminated glass plate and the sky. I have purposely entered so much into the details of earlier investigations, 18 because in photometric work it is difficult to find out reliable methods, and 20 to justify the supposition that the question must be much more complicated, as the results differ widely from those obtained by star-gauges. In the next chapter, I will pass on to the description of the methods and instruments used in...
